Unit 6 Test

"When I was ten years old, I worked on my father's farm, digging, hoeing, and gathering and carrying our crop. We had no horses because only officials are allowed to have horses in China. I worked on my father's farm until I was about sixteen years old, when a man from our clan came back from America. In America, he had purchased land about as large as four city blocks and made it into a paradise. The man had left our village as a poor boy. Now, he returned with unlimited wealth, which he had obtained in the country of the American wizards.

The man's wealth filled my mind with the idea that I, too, would like to go to the country of the wizards and gain some of their wealth. After a long time, my father gave me his blessing and my mother took leave of me with tears. My father gave me some money and I went with five other boys from our village to take a steamship from Hong Kong. The engines that moved the ship were wonderful monsters, strong enough to lift mountains.

When I got to San Francisco, I was half-starved because I was afraid to eat American food. But after a few days of living in the Chinese quarter, I was happy again. A man got me work as a servant with an American family and my start was the same as most of the Chinese in this country."

Li Zhou, laborer from Guangzhou province in southern China, interview given to a reporter in the United States describing his journey to the United States in the 1860s

1. On a global scale, the gender makeup of the migrants referred to in the second paragraph best helps to explain which of the following social changes in home societies in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries?

(A) Dramatic population increases leading to the adoption of new government policies to limit the birth of children

(B) Women taking on new roles that had been formerly occupied by men ✓

(C) A greater reliance on children performing indentured labor

(D) An increase in workers joining labor unions to demand higher wages

Answer B

Correct. Since most of the migrants in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries were males, women in home societies often had to take on new roles that had previously been occupied by men, such as working outside of the home and managing family businesses.

2. Late-nineteenth-century transoceanic labor migrations were most directly facilitated by which of the following developments?

(A) The restructuring of traditional social hierarchies

(B) The development of new, more affordable methods of transportation ✓

(C) The growing popularity of free-trade economic policies

(D) The emergence of transnational businesses

Unit 6 Test

Answer B

Correct. Most migrants in the nineteenth century reached their destinations on board large passenger ships powered by steam engines. Steam ships not only allowed migrants to travel across the oceans more quickly and safely, they was also provided a more affordable means of transportation.

3. Long-distance immigration to the Americas in the late nineteenth century most often contributed to which of the following processes?

(A) The worsening of gender imbalances in receiving societies, as the great majority of migrants were men

(B) Restrictions on migrants performing industrial labor in factories in the receiving societies

(C) Reverse migration, whereby most migrants returned to their countries of origin after becoming financially secure

(D) Growing rates of urbanization as migrants predominantly settled in cities in the receiving societies ✓

Answer D

Correct. Most migrants to the Americas in the late nineteenth century settled in cities such as Buenos Aires, São Paulo, and San Francisco, which led to increasing rates of urbanization in receiving societies.

Unit 6 Test

"Let us take North America, for instance, and the richest portion of it—the Mississippi basin—to compare with the Congo River basin in Africa. When early explorers such as de Soto first navigated the Mississippi and the Indians were the undisputed masters of that enormous river basin, the European spirit of enterprise would have found only a few valuable products there—mainly some furs and timber.

The Congo River basin is, however, much more promising at the stage of underdevelopment. The forests on the banks of the Congo are filled with precious hardwoods; among the climbing vines in the forest is the one from which rubber is produced (the best of which sells for two shillings per pound), and among its palms are some whose oil is a staple article of commerce and others whose fibers make the best cordage.

But what is of far more value, the Congo River basin has over 40 million moderately industrious and workable people. It is among them that the European trader may fix his residence for years and develop commerce to his profit with very little risks involved. In dwelling over the advantages possessed by the Congo here, it has been my goal to rouse this spirit of trade. I do not wish to see the area become a place where poor migrants from Europe would settle. There are over 40 million natives here who are poor and degraded already merely because they are surrounded on all sides by hostile forces of nature and man, denying them contact with the civilizational elements that might have ameliorated the unhappiness of their condition. If you were to plant European pauperism amongst them, it would soon degenerate to the low level of native African pauperism. Instead, the man who is wanted is the enterprising merchant who receives the raw produce from the native in exchange for the finished product of the manufacturer's loom. It is the merchant who can direct and teach the African pauper what to gather in the multitude of things around him. Merchants are the missionaries of commerce adapted for nowhere so well as for the Congo River basin where there are so many idle hands and such abundant opportunities."

Henry Morton Stanley, Welsh-American journalist, explorer, and agent for King Leopold of Belgium's Congo Free State, The Congo and the Founding of Its Free State, book published in 1885

4. Stanley's description of the riches of the Congo in the first two paragraphs can best be seen as an attempt to

(A) place European expansion in the Congo in the context of earlier imperial ventures that had ended in disaster for the native population of the colonized country

(B) place European expansion in the Congo in the context of other instances in which inter-European rivalries had prevented the successful economic exploitation of colonial territories

(C) place European expansion in the Congo in the context of other imperial ventures that had seemed difficult at first but have subsequently turned out to be highly valuable ✓

(D) place European expansion in the Congo in the context of other instances in which British imperial policies had been proven to be more successful than the policies of other European countries

Answer C

Correct. Stanley mentions in the first paragraph that European exploration and expansion in the Mississippi River basin was not easy but proved to be of economic value and that, while the Congo River basin was undeveloped, it could prove an even more valuable source of economic resources.

5. The commodities listed by Stanley in the second paragraph can best be understood in the context of

Unit 6 Test

(A) Europeans' need for resources to be used in industrial production ✓

(B) raw materials that could be used in African manufacturing centers

(C) crops that could be cultivated on plantations and industrial farms by European settlers

(D) products that would be most suited for export to the Mississippi region of North America

Answer A

Correct. In the second paragraph, Stanley mentions various natural products that could be extracted for economic value and presumably exported to Europe to be turned into finished goods. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Europeans extracted natural resources from Africa and exported them to Europe where European manufacturers turned them into finished goods for sale on the global market.

6. Based on the third paragraph, Stanley's vision of the future of the Congo River basin can best be seen as part of which of the following late-nineteenth-century developments?

(A) Settler imperialism

(B) The view of imperialism as the "White Man's Burden"

(C) Economic imperialism ✓

(D) The belief that imperialism should be spearheaded by religious missionaries

Answer C

Correct. Stanley mentions in the third paragraph that European merchants must be responsible for the economic development of the Congo River basin and that raw materials from the Congo River basin should be exported to manufacturing centers in Europe in order to produce finished goods. This type of economic exploitation that Stanley advocates is called economic imperialism.

"The Australian nation is another case of a great civilization supplanting a lower race unable to make full use of the land and its resources. The struggle means suffering, intense suffering, while it is in progress; but that struggle and that suffering have been the stages by which the White man has reached his present stage of development, and they account for the fact that he no longer lives in caves and feeds on roots and nuts. This dependence of progress on the survival of the fitter race, terribly harsh as it may seem to some of you, gives the struggle for existence its redeeming features; it is the fiery crucible out of which comes the finer metal."

Karl Pearson, British mathematics professor, National Life from the Standpoint of Science, 1900

Unit 6 Test

7. Based on the passage, the author would most likely have agreed with which of the following statements?

(A) Britain's founding of Australia followed God's command to convert non-Whites.

(B) All peoples of the world have the right to determine their own government.

(C) Britain had contributed to human progress by taking over new colonies in Africa. ✓

(D) Nations go to war with each other mainly to gain precious metals.

Answer C

This option is correct. Pearson's arguments in the passage indicate that he and other Social Darwinists would agree that human progress results from the subjugation of weaker and inferior populations by the stronger and, therefore, Britain's creation of a colonial empire in Africa would result in the improvement of the human species.

8. In the late 1800s, attitudes such as the one expressed in the passage had contributed most directly to which of the following?

(A) European states' competition to acquire overseas colonies ✓

(B) The abolitionist movement to end slavery

(C) The creation of industrialized economies in Europe

(D) Efforts by European missionaries to convert non-Europeans to Christianity for their spiritual salvation

Answer A

This option is correct. The attitudes expressed in the passage justified European subjugation of so-called inferior races in Africa and Asia as akin to a Darwinian competition for survival.

9. Pearson's argument in the passage is most clearly representative of which of the following ideologies?

(A) Free-market capitalism

(B) Marxism

(C) Mercantilism

(D) Social Darwinism ✓

Unit 6 Test

Answer D

This option is correct. Social Darwinists argued that societies are subject to the laws of natural selection and characterized by a struggle for existence in which only the fittest survive. The theory legitimized the creation of racial hierarchies and policies of imperialist expansionism.

"The misfortunes and decline of this country [Bengal, a region in eastern India] began on the day of the Muslim conquest. Just as a storm wreaks destruction and disorder upon a garden, so did the unscrupulous and tyrannical Muslims destroy the happiness and good fortune of Bengal. Ravaged by endless waves of oppression, the people of Bengal became withdrawn and timid. Hinduism, our native religion, also took distorted forms.

But there are limits to everything. When the oppressions of the Muslims became intolerable, Brahma, the Lord of the Universe, provided a means of escape. The resumption of Bengal's good fortune began on the day the British flag was first planted on this land. Tell me, if Muslim rule had continued, what would the condition of this country have been today? It must be loudly declared that it is to bless us that the Lord Brahma has brought the English to this country. British rule has ended the atrocities of Muslim rule. There can be no comparison between the two: the difference seems to be greater than that between darkness and light or between misery and bliss."

Bholanath Chakravarti, Bengali religious scholar, lecture at a meeting of a Hindu reformist society, Kolkata, India, 1876

10. The author's political point of view can be most clearly seen in the way in which the passage

(A) neglects to mention that South Asian migrants were a key source of labor for Western transnational corporations

(B) disparages the development of contemporary Hinduism

(C) omits any mention of the economic exploitation and resource extraction practiced by the British in India ✓

(D) attributes historical events to divine intervention

Answer C

Correct. Because he was a Hindu nationalist, Chakravarti's point of view is that Muslim rule in India had oppressed the Hindu majority and that by removing Muslim rule, the British had helped the Hindu cause. The fact that Chakravrti neglects to mention the negative aspects of British imperial rule in India is consistent with this pro-British point of view.

11. The arguments expressed in the passage are significant because they help explain why

Unit 6 Test

(A) social divisions within colonial societies often hindered the efforts of anticolonial movements to overthrow imperial rule ✓

(B) syncretic religious movements frequently emerged from cultural differences in colonial societies

(C) nationalist movements against imperial rule often sought to bridge ethnic and religious differences by appealing to popular Enlightenment ideals

(D) settler colonies frequently exacerbated differences between religious groups in colonial societies

Answer A

Correct. Western imperial states were able to exploit existing social divisions in many colonial societies in Africa and Asia, cooperating with some groups in order to maintain control and economic dominance. In fact, they needed to do so because of the expense of European administrators and the need to communicate across cultures. Anticolonial movements had difficulty mobilizing entire populations against imperial rule until they were able to create enough of a sense of national identity (itself spread by Western colonialists) to bridge the social gulf between groups. Even then, national identity remained contested.

12. A historian analyzing the lecture would most likely argue that the audience of Chakravarti's lecture is significant because it shows the most direct contrast with which of the following developments in the nineteenth century?

(A) Religious differences in colonial societies often led to communal violence.

(B) Imperial states often granted preference to religious groups that they felt were less of a threat to their power.

(C) Religious movements often inspired rebellions against imperial rule. ✓

(D) Imperial governments often consulted local religious leaders before issuing important decrees.

Answer C

Correct. Religious movements in the nineteenth century often led rebellions against imperial authorities. So, the fact that Chakravarti was presenting his lecture about the benefits of British rule to a Hindu reformist society shows a direct contrast with this nineteenth-century development.

Unit 6 Test

PHOTOGRAPH OF A FRENCH SCHOOL IN ALGIERS, INCLUDED IN A FRENCH GOVERNMENT PUBLICATION SHOWING SCENES FROM COLONIAL ALGERIA, 1857

Private Collection / Archives Charmet / Bridgeman Images

The title of the photograph is "French Arab School in Algiers Under the Supervision of the Colonial Arab Bureau, Class Taught by Monsieur Depielle." The writing on the chalkboard reads: "My children, love France, your new homeland."

13. The photograph best illustrates which of the following aspects of European colonial policies in nineteenth-century Africa?

(A) European states attempting to encourage colonial populations to emigrate

(B) European states attempting to spread Christianity among colonial populations

(C) European states imposing democratic systems of government in order to prepare colonial populations for self-rule

(D) European states imposing their culture in an attempt to spread their values among colonial populations ✓

Answer D

Correct. The image shows a French instructor in a school established by French colonial authorities teaching Algerian children the French language and telling them that France is their new homeland. The creation of European school systems in colonial territories and instruction in European languages was part of a "civilizing" mission that often also included imperial authorities encouraging colonial subjects to wear Western clothes and to, sometimes, convert to Christianity.

14. The ability of the French colonial government in Algeria to establish schools for the native Algerian population can best be seen as part of which of the following broader developments in European colonialism in the late nineteenth century?

(A) Some European states established trading-post empires.

(B) Some European states strengthened their control over their existing colonies. ✓

(C) Some European states faced native resistance to their colonization efforts.

(D) Some European states used Social Darwinism to justify their military subjugation of colonial peoples.

Answer B

Correct. The French colonization of Algeria started in the 1830s, and by the late nineteenth century, France had significantly strengthened its control of the colony through a mixture of military deployments, encouragement of French settlers to move to Algeria, and the development of roads and urban infrastructure. This strengthening of imperial control over existing colonies was a common pattern among European colonial powers in the late nineteenth century, and it made possible the implementation of educational and social programs among the colonial populations.

15. The rapid expansion of European empires in Africa in the late nineteenth century is best explained in the context of which of the following?

(A) Economic competition between European states fostering the creation of transnational business that sought to exchange raw materials from Europe for finished goods from colonies

(B) Political rivalries between European states encouraging diplomatic agreements that reserved colonies for European powers ✓

(C) Rapid population increases in European colonies in Asia encouraging European states to create new colonies for migrants to settle

(D) Revolutions in Europe leading European states to seek troops from colonial populations

Answer B

Correct. Political rivalries between European states encouraged the partition of Africa into potential European colonies. Indeed, at the Berlin Conference of 1884–1885, European powers divided Africa into spheres of influence. In order to hold on to these claims, European states rushed into colonizing adventures designed to establish at least a nominal degree of control over vast portions of the African continent. The entire enterprise came to be known as "The Scramble for Africa" and changed the amount of African territory occupied by European powers from 10 percent in 1870 to 90 percent in 1900.

THE FOUR HUMAN RACES*, ILLUSTRATION IN THE STANDARD SOCIAL STUDIES TEXTBOOK USED IN MIDDLE SCHOOLS IN FRANCE DURING THE 1880s AND 1890s

A caption below the image reads:
The White Race, the most perfect of the human races, lives mostly in Europe, West Asia, North Africa, and North America. It is characterized by its oval head and rather thin lips. The complexion may vary in color but is generally light.
The Yellow Race occupies mostly East Asia, China, and Japan. It is characterized by its high cheekbones and almond-shaped eyes.
The Red Race, which once upon a time inhabited all of North and South America, has reddish skin, deeply set eyes, and a long and arched nose. The Black Race, which occupies mostly Africa and the southern parts of Oceania, has skin that is very dark, dark brown eyes, and curly hair.

16. The image and its caption provide evidence that would best help explain the ideas of which of the following ideologies that emerged in the late nineteenth century?

Unit 6 Test

(A) Communism
(B) Nationalism
(C) Mercantilism
(D) Social Darwinism ✓

Answer D

Correct. Social Darwinism applied Darwinian theories of natural selection to justify racial categorization of human populations similar to those seen in the caption of the social studies textbook. These categories served to justify racism and imperial expansion during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

17. Based on the context of European imperialism in the late nineteenth century, a historian examining the image and its caption would likely explain that they provide evidence of how France sought to

(A) remind students that African states directly threatened France and its way of life
(B) demonstrate that the transfer of its republican system of government to French colonies would prepare those colonies for eventual independence
(C) reassure students that France's colonial policies were justified by a so-called "civilizing mission" ✓
(D) help integrate migrants from its colonies into French society

Answer C

Correct. The racial categories identified in the caption sustained European notions of the innate superiority of people of European descent and consequent right to rule. These categories offered justification for policies that were designed to "better" or "civilize" colonial societies and cultures.

Unit 6 Test

18. Although ideas of European superiority over non-Europeans had existed for centuries, views such as those expressed in the passage provide evidence of an important change in the late nineteenth century that is best explained by the fact that they

(A) combined old cultural prejudice with supposedly "scientific" new ideas of the biological and evolutionary basis of human differences ✓

(B) were based on the premise that the biological diversity of the human species should be reduced through support of interracial marriages

(C) romanticized non-European peoples by portraying them as "noble savages" closer to nature than "overcivilized" Europeans

(D) reflected new anthropological and linguistic research that showed that all humans share a common African ancestor

Answer A

Correct. The attitudes evident in the caption illustrate a transition from old prejudices that emphasized the religious and cultural differences between Europeans and African, Asian, and Native American populations to pseudoscientific explanations that emphasized supposed differences in skin color, mental acuity, and other biological measures of distinction.

"By 1830 an English textile worker was already producing with his mechanical spinning machine 350 to 400 times as much yarn per hour as an Indian craftsman with his traditional spinning wheel. The consequences for Indian textile production were fatal. In 1814 India imported one million meters of English textiles, in 1820 it imported 13 million and in 1890 more than two billion. British rule in India gave the British manufacturers free rein and made the protection of indigenous producers impossible. It stands to reason that Karl Marx condemned the driving force behind British expansion in India by calling it the 'millocracy' [meaning rule by the owners of textile mills]. . . .

To be sure, the immense productivity of English textile workers from the early nineteenth century on made this branch of British industry superior to all of its former competitors, colonial and noncolonial alike. But while other countries could shield themselves from this danger by introducing protectionist tariffs, such protection did not exist in the British colonies. So here, in the case of the destruction of Indian textile industry, we see the importance of the colonial situation, namely the colonies' political dependence on the West, in arresting their economic development."

Henk L. Wesseling, Dutch historian of colonial South and Southeast Asia, The European Colonial Empires, 1815–1919, book published in 2003

19. The economic statistics cited by Wesseling in the first paragraph are most likely intended to illustrate which aspect of the nineteenth-century global context?

(A) The deteriorating working conditions of British industrial workers

(B) The growing demand for calicoes and other Indian textiles in Britain

(C) The role of British imperial policy in reversing the development of Indian textile manufacturing ✓

(D) The spread of socialist ideology in the colonies in response to European economic exploitation

Unit 6 Test

Answer C

Correct. The statistics that Wesseling cites demonstrate that the Indian textile industry was devastated by the ability of British textile mills to mass-produce cloth on a scale with which Indian textile workers could not compete.

20. Wesseling's argument in the second paragraph best illustrates which of the following important distinctions within the practice of imperialism in the nineteenth century?

(A) The difference between European and non-European imperialism

(B) The difference between land-based imperial expansion and overseas or maritime imperial expansion

(C) The difference between the economic costs of imperialism and its economic benefits

(D) The difference between the economic effects of direct and indirect imperialism ✓

Answer D

Correct. Wesseling argues that because India was ruled by Great Britain directly (whether through the English East India Company or by the Crown), it could not erect tariff barriers to protect its textile industry. In Latin America and other parts of Asia, however, Western states practiced indirect economic imperialism. Although Latin American and Asian states that experienced Western economic imperialism often had a very difficult time protecting their industries, they could do so; their local industries often partnered with Western companies, and they often did not experience the same degree of economic devastation as in directly ruled colonies such as India.

21. Which other process in the mid to late nineteenth century most directly led to situations in which non-Western countries found it very difficult to protect their indigenous industries from Western competition, as described in the passage?

(A) The imposition of free-trade regimes on countries such as China, the Ottoman Empire, and Latin American countries through military or diplomatic pressure from Western countries ✓

(B) The successful modernization and Westernization of countries such as Japan and Russia, through domestic economic reforms and efforts to attract foreign investments

(C) The evolution of White settler colonies, such as Canada and Australia, into mostly self-governing dominion territories within the British Empire

(D) The emergence and spread of anti-imperialist sentiments and political movements in some European colonies, such as British India and Dutch Indonesia, as a result of the spread of nationalism

Unit 6 Test

Answer A

Correct. In the mid to late nineteenth century, Western states used military and diplomatic pressure in Latin America, the Ottoman Empire, and China to impose free-trade regimes that greatly benefited Western companies because free trade allowed Western companies to dump their goods into Latin American and Asian markets at lower prices than local companies.

22. Which of the following aspects of the Marxist critique of capitalism would be most useful in understanding why the author of the passage chose to invoke Karl Marx's thought in the first paragraph?

(A) Most Marxists believed that capitalism would be overthrown by a workers' revolution, and Wesseling is arguing that colonial workers were also beginning to organize for a revolution.

(B) Many Marxists argued that imperialism is the last and final stage of capitalism, and Wesseling's analysis is premised on the same belief.

(C) Many Marxists criticized imperialism for arresting the economic development of the colonies and reducing them to mere raw material export economies, and Wesseling appears to agree with that criticism. ✓

(D) Some Marxists emphasized imperialism's positive economic impacts in introducing more modern modes of production into the colonies, and Wesseling seems to agree with that assessment.

Answer C

Correct. Marx's statement about the "millocracy" that ruled India is consistent with the Marxist criticism that imperialism arrested the economic development of colonies. Wesseling's description of the devastation of the Indian textile industry in the passage and his decision to quote Marx indicate that he agrees with that Marxist criticism.

Unit 6 Test

JAPANESE FUMI-E ("STEPPING-ON PICTURE"), A TYPE OF METAL PLATE CARVED WITH CHRISTIAN IMAGERY, USED BY THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT TO IDENTIFY SUSPECTED CHRISTIANS, CIRCA 1630

Heritage Images / Contributor

Japanese authorities required suspected Japanese Christians to tread on fumi-e plates based on the belief that Christians would refuse to disrespect images of Jesus Christ and other Christian religious figures.

23. The object shown in the image is best understood in the context of which of the following developments between 1450 and 1750 ?

(A) The introduction of Chinese religious and cultural influences in Japan

(B) The fall of the Tokugawa Shogunate and restoration of direct imperial rule

(C) The growth of Russian cultural influence in East Asia as a result of the Russian expansion into Siberia

(D) The influence of European merchants and missionaries along Asian maritime trade routes ✓

Answer D

Correct. Trade routes had brought both European merchants and missionaries to Japan, eventually leading to a backlash against foreign influences such as Christianity under the Tokugawa regime.

24. The use of objects such as the one shown in the image best illustrates which of the following historical processes from 1450 to 1750 ?

Unit 6 Test

(A) Some Asian states sought to limit foreign encroachment in their internal affairs. ✓
(B) Political leaders in Asia commissioned works of art to legitimize their rule.
(C) Religious conversion by state rulers was often followed by the mass conversion of state populations.
(D) The territorial expansion of Asian land-based empires limited European influence in many parts of Asia.

Answer A

Correct. States such as China and Japan imposed restrictions on Christian missionary activity in hopes of reducing or eliminating foreign, particularly European, influence in their countries.

25. In the late nineteenth century, Japanese attitudes toward European cultural influences changed as a direct result of

(A) Japan isolating its economy from trade with Western markets
(B) Japan enacting political reforms during the Meiji Era ✓
(C) Japan defeating China in the First Sino-Japanese War
(D) Japan extending its empire over most of Southeast Asia

Answer B

Correct. Meiji-Era political reforms, such as the adoption of a constitutional monarchy, reflected a significant shift toward Western political norms.

26. In which of the following regions between 1450 and 1750 was Christian missionary activity met with the LEAST amount of resistance by non-European states?

(A) The Americas ✓
(B) The Middle East
(C) The Indian subcontinent
(D) Central Asia

Answer A

Correct. Christian missionaries, often with state support from Spain and Portugal, were very successful in converting many Native Americans to Catholic Christianity in Central and South America. Due to the European conquest of the major indigenous states in the Americas, there was little state resistance to

Unit 6 Test

Christian missionary activity.

"Traditionally, historians have presented the 1400s and 1500s as the 'age of discovery,' when Europeans began to explore territories in Asia, Africa, and America. Yet research over the past twenty-five years has made it increasingly clear that this age of discovery was rooted in extensive [pre-existing] contact among peoples in Eurasia. . . . No episode better illustrates the extent of these intercontinental connections than an . . . anecdote from the initial encounter between Portuguese and Indian officials in Calicut. According to the story, [Vasco] Da Gama . . . harbored some apprehension about how a foreign Portuguese [explorer] might be received. So he selected a convict on board, João Nunes, to go ashore first to see what would happen. Much to the surprise of Da Gama, local officials recognized [Nunes] as . . . Portuguese, and took him to two North Africans who [spoke] Castilian and Genoese.[1]

The recognition of Nunes as Portuguese, as well as the presence of Africans familiar with two European languages in India, highlights the cosmopolitan character of Asian commercial centers and the prevalence of long-distance travel long before the period of European expansion."

Charles Parker, historian, Global Interactions in the Early Modern Age, book published in 2010

[1] languages spoken in Spain and Italy, respectively

27. Which of the following could best be used to support the author's argument about trade in the period 1450–1750 ?

(A) Indian Ocean ports facilitated trade between Africa, India, and Southeast Asia. ✓

(B) European merchants were the sole drivers of transregional trade.

(C) Demand for labor in the Americas led to increased trade in the Atlantic world.

(D) China and Japan limited their interaction with European merchants in order to preserve their cultural traditions.

Answer A

Correct. Portuguese explorers established their maritime empire in a network of Indian Ocean ports that facilitated trade between Africa, India, and Southeast Asia.

28. The Portuguese exploration referred to in the passage was most directly enabled by which of the following?

(A) Military tactics relying on the use of heavily armed cavalry troops

(B) The use of printing presses to spread new religious ideas

(C) Joint-stock companies and other methods of securing private funding for trade voyages

(D) Navigational knowledge of Indian Ocean currents and wind patterns ✓

Unit 6 Test

Answer D

Correct. Portuguese exploration was most directly influenced by navigational knowledge of Indian Ocean currents and wind patterns, which enabled them to journey around Africa and access the Indian Ocean directly.

29. Which of the following best describes a claim made by the author in the passage?

(A) The expansion of African empires contributed to increased global trade.

(B) Trade networks in Asia were highly interconnected before contact with European explorers. ✓

(C) There was an extensive slave trade across the Indian Ocean.

(D) The Spanish Reconquista led to significant European exploration.

Answer B

Correct. The claim made by the author in the passage stresses the importance of interconnected Asian trade networks to the successes of European explorers in the "age of discovery."

Unit 6 Test

ILLUSTRATION IN A MANUSCRIPT WRITTEN TO CELEBRATE THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE OTTOMAN SULTAN SULEIMAN THE MAGNIFICENT, CIRCA 1560

Paul Fearn / Alamy Stock Photo

The image shows Ottoman officials forcibly enlisting boys from the empire's Christian subjects in the Balkans to train them for service in the Ottoman army and bureaucracy.

Unit 6 Test

30. The Ottoman Empire's recruitment of soldiers and bureaucrats through the system depicted in the image is most similar to which broader method that rulers used to strengthen their empires in the period 1450–1750 ?

(A) The collection of tribute ✓

(B) Establishment of religious uniformity

(C) Abolition of feudal privileges

(D) The granting of autonomy to minority groups

Answer A

Correct. The image illustrates the Ottoman devshirme system, through which young boys were forcibly recruited to serve as soldiers in the Ottoman army or as officials in the Ottoman administration. Although the devshirme system produced military and bureaucratic professionals, not money or goods for the Ottoman treasury, it was similar to a tribute collection system in that it extracted resources for the use of the state from conquered or tributary regions.

31. The recruitment depicted in the image is best understood in the context of which of the following developments in the period 1450–1750 ?

(A) Attempts by imperial states to expand their economic power

(B) Attempts by imperial states to prevent religious conflict

(C) Attempts by imperial states to centralize their authority ✓

(D) Attempts by imperial states to control population growth

Answer C

Correct. The forced recruitment of soldiers and officials through practices such as the Ottoman devshirme increased the military and administrative capacity of states. In some cases, such that of the Ottoman Empire, these soldiers and officials were solely dependent on the ruler's favor and thereby helped expand and centralize state authority.

32. The inclusion of the image in the manuscript best illustrates which of the following features of the period 1450–1750 ?

Unit 6 Test

(A) Rulers using art as a way to communicate with their illiterate subjects

(B) Rulers using art to expand their territories

(C) Rulers using art as a way to increase literacy

(D) Rulers using art to legitimize their rule ✓

Answer D

Correct. The illustration was included in a manuscript intended to glorify the achievements of Suleiman the Magnificent and thereby demonstrate his legitimacy. The image thus illustrates how art was used by rulers to legitimize their rule in the period 1450–1750.

"In the context of the Ottoman Empire, toleration [ensured] that, as a rule, non-Muslims would not be persecuted. No doubt, as dhimmis,* according to Islam, they were second-class citizens . . . who endured a healthy dose of daily prejudice. [Nevertheless, the Ottomans tolerated religious and ethnic difference] because it had something to contribute. That is, difference added to the empire; it did not detract from it and, therefore, it was commended. Toleration had a [beneficial] quality; maintaining peace and order was good for imperial life, diversity contributed to imperial welfare. . . .

The Ottoman Empire fared better than did its predecessors or contemporaries [in tolerating religious and ethnic difference] until the beginning of the eighteenth century, largely as a result of its understanding of difference and its resourcefulness in [administrative organization]. It maintained relative peace with its various communities and also ensured that interethnic strife would not occur."

*Islamic law defines dhimmis as non-Muslim communities living under Muslim political rule

Karen Barkey, Turkish-American historian and sociologist, Empire of Difference: The Ottomans in Comparative Perspective, published in 2008

33. All of the following statements about the Ottoman Empire in the period 1450–1750 are factually accurate. Which would most strongly support Barkey's claim regarding the Ottoman state and toleration in the passage?

(A) The Ottoman army increasingly relied on the contributions of the Janissary corps, which was mostly composed of soldiers of non-Turkic origin. ✓

(B) Some Ottoman sultans such as Selim I refused to accept the legitimacy of the Safavid rulers of Persia because they were Shi'a Muslims.

(C) Some Ottoman sultans such as Suleiman the Magnificent patronized Sufi mystics, whose heterodox practices were sometimes condemned by the Sunni religious elite.

(D) The Ottoman government required any cases involving a dispute between Muslims and non-Muslims to be resolved according to Islamic law.

Answer A

Correct. The Ottomans' use of non-Turkic troops as a core part of their army shows that ethnic tolerance and diversity might benefit the empire in certain circumstances, as Barkey argues.

Unit 6 Test

34. Which of the following developments in the period 1450–1750 would a historian most likely cite to support Barkey's claim regarding the Ottoman Empire and its predecessors and contemporaries in the first sentence of the second paragraph?

(A) The recruitment of Italian and Dutch merchants and officers into the Portuguese and Spanish navies

(B) The use of Hindu officials in the Mughal imperial administration

(C) The establishment of racial categories of social hierarchy under the casta system in Spanish colonies in the Americas ✓

(D) The official protection granted to Protestant communities in some European states, such as France, following religious conflicts

Answer C

Correct. The establishment of a system of racial and social hierarchy in Spanish colonies in the Americas would support Barkey's claim that previous and contemporary states were less tolerant, because the casta system imposed a rigid social hierarchy that included legal discrimination against groups that were further down the social ladder.

35. Which of the following claims that Barkey makes in the passage appears to contradict most directly her assertion in the first sentence of the first paragraph?

(A) Ottoman administration played an important role in fostering tolerance in the empire.

(B) Ottoman tolerance helped maintain peace and order.

(C) Non-Muslims were second-class citizens who endured prejudice. ✓

(D) The Ottoman Empire's policies ensured that interethnic strife did not occur.

Answer C

Correct. Barkey contends that non-Muslims were not persecuted in the Ottoman Empire but then immediately states that they were second-class citizens who endured prejudice. Since Barkey does not clarify what she means by "persecution," this statement appears to be contradictory.

Unit 6 Test

"OBJECTIVES OF YOUR JOURNEY

In these parts of West Africa, France has obtained a few treaties with powerful chiefs, on the basis of which she claims immense regions in the great bend of the Niger River. She also sends French adventurers into a recognized British sphere of influence to make further treaties with native persons who claim to be the rulers or kings of certain regions. The goal of your journey therefore will be to

(a) in places where the French pretend they have made treaties with the native rulers, to obtain a written declaration from the rulers that such statements are false, and then to make treaties for us;

(b) in places where the French have made no such pretense, to secure treaties accompanied by a short declaration that no previous treaties have been made with any European; . . .

(d) to collect detailed information of every kind about the regions you visit, but especially to make inquiries as to the existence of gold—either gold sands in rivers or gold lodes in rock; . . .

(f) to impress upon all African chiefs how advantageous it would be for them to have Europeans bringing goods to their country, which can only be done if they sign the treaties; . . .

(h) to note especially carefully the prevalence of gum arabic trees, shea butter trees, and rubber vines* in each region you visit."

Letter from the directors of the British Royal Niger Company to its agent, Captain Frederick Lugard, directing him to travel up the Niger River in West Africa, 1894

*African trees that were used by Europeans in the production of cosmetics and processed food additives (gum Arabic), soap and candles (Shea butter), and tires and machine transmission belts (rubber)

36. The rival British and French claims over the Niger River region in the 1890s were most directly a part of which of the following processes?

(A) The British efforts to safeguard the routes to India, Great Britain's most important colony

(B) The response of established colonial powers to the ambitions of new imperial states such as Germany and Italy

(C) The European "scramble" to acquire territories in Africa through both peaceful and military means ✓

(D) The shift from "imperialism by company" to direct imperial rule in many European colonies

Answer C

Correct. The letter from the directors of the British Royal Niger Company illustrates British attempts to secure its influence in West Africa and limit French influence through peaceful means preferably, but military means if necessary. British-French competition in West Africa in the late nineteenth century took place in the context of the "Scramble for Africa," during which European powers attempted to secure their respective spheres of influence in Africa by claiming colonial territories.

Unit 6 Test

37. The instructions to Lugard in articles (d) and (f) best reflect which of the following regarding the purpose of the board of directors' letter?

(A) As a high-ranking agent of the British Royal Niger Company, Lugard would have been likely to recognize on his own the economic potential of the areas he was about to explore.

(B) As a commercial enterprise, the British Royal Niger Company hoped that Lugard's voyage would allow it to expand its exports of African raw materials to Europe and its imports of European finished goods to Africa. ✓

(C) As tropical disease made travel in Africa dangerous to Europeans, the board of directors needed to emphasize the economic rewards that Lugard would personally reap if his mission was successful.

(D) As a transnational company competing for business on the global market, the British Royal Niger Company wished to obtain information about the financial resources of its competitors.

Answer B

Correct. Article (d) orders Lugard to record the existence of precious metals such as gold, and article (f) instructs Lugard to convey to African chiefs how economically advantageous it would be for them to allow European merchants to import goods from Europe to the chiefs' territories. This shows that the British Royal Niger Company was interested in obtaining African raw materials and exporting European finished goods to Africa.

38. Which aspect of the historical situation in West Africa in the 1890s best explains the board of directors' instructions to Lugard in article (h) of the letter?

(A) Europeans still had very limited information about the physical geography of the West African interior.

(B) West Africa was becoming a source of important raw materials for Europe's industrializing economies. ✓

(C) In the aftermath of the abolition of the trans-Atlantic slave trade, Europeans lost interest in West Africa, both politically and economically.

(D) High levels of local resistance to imperialism effectively prevented Europeans from extending their control in West Africa beyond coastal regions until the very end of the twentieth century.

Answer B

Correct. Article (h) directs Lugard to record the occurrence of gum arabic trees, shea butter trees, and rubber vines in the regions he is about to visit. All three of these trees were sources of prized raw materials for European industries such as food processing, soap making, and tire production. The singling out of these particular plant species suggests that West Africa was seen by the members of the board of directors as a potential source of industrial raw materials for European factories.

Unit 6 Test

"Imagine that Chinese ships were to start importing arsenic* into England, advertising it as a harmless, foreign and fashionable luxury. Next, imagine that after a few years of arsenic being all the rage, with hundreds of thousands using it, the British government were to ban its use because of its bad effects. Finally, imagine again that, in opposition to this ban on arsenic, Chinese ships were to be positioned off the coast of England, making occasional raids on London.

Advocates of the opium-smuggling profession argue that it is immensely profitable and that supplying opium in bulk as they are doing is not immoral and it only becomes vulgar when the opium is sold in small portions, to individual users. What admirable logic with which one may shield oneself from reality, satisfied that the opium trade is nothing more than 'supplying an important source of revenue to British companies operating in India.'

The trade may be a profitable one—it may be of importance to the Indian government, and to individuals— but to pretend that it can be defended as harmless to health and morals is to argue the impossible. Anyone who seriously thinks about the subject cannot defend what is, in itself, manifestly indefensible."

*a poisonous substance

"Remarks on the Opium Trade," letter to a British magazine from an anonymous English merchant in Guangzhou (Canton), China, published in 1836

39. The trade described in the passage is best seen as an early example of which of the following?

(A) The economic decline of Asian states resulting from the importation of cheap consumer goods from Europe

(B) The growing economic influence of European immigrants in China

(C) The declining political power of European joint-stock companies in Asia because of states assuming direct imperial control

(D) The use of economic imperialism by European merchants and states ✓

40. A historian might argue that the trade described in the passage reflected a turning point in world history primarily because the opium trade

(A) shifted the pattern of historic European trade imbalances with China ✓

(B) marked the transition from mercantilist trade toward capitalist free trade

(C) was the first time that Europeans used migrant labor to grow crops for global distribution

(D) relied upon industrial techniques of production and modern consumer marketing
